The Flat Bike Collective is an efficient service that welcomes everyone in the biking community regardless of background. The Collective aims to promote cycling through the sharing of facilities and expertise, providing access to tools, space, and parts. They work to make cycling very accessible by providing such resources, and advocate for sustainability not only through their own efforts within the service, but by partnering with the McGill Office of Sustainability to host events. Throughout the year, they held workshops for those looking to learn about bike maintenance and repair.

Despite the continued closure of the University Centre, Midnight Kitchen has done a great job of continuing their services as best as they can. They offer solidarity servings, as well as food bank services to the McGill community and wider Montreal community as well. They have an anti-oppression mandate and advocates for social justice through events that aim to raise awareness of oppression. They provide a working alternative to capitalist, profit-driven systems of food production and distribution.

The McGill Student Emergency Response Team (MSERT) is a volunteer service whose members provide emergency first aid services to McGill University and the Montreal community. The members primarily respond to situations of physical health, and are trained at the First Responder level to treat a broad range of emergency and non-emergency situations. They are efficient, frequently used and the McGill community is grateful for them according to the surveys that were sent out.
